A right is something that someone is entitled to get or have by law. Children also have rights. They have the right to life, participation rights, developmental rights, participation rights and right to security.

Right to life involves the provision of all the basic needs which include food, shelter and clothing. Lack of these needs makes a child live miserably.

Developmental rights group all the efforts that make a child live independently in his or her future life. These efforts includes; giving the child quality education, providing the child with time to play, safe space of play and play materials as well as ensuring the child is in good health, not forgetting to praise a child for job well done.

Participation rights means allowing a child to take part in matters affecting him or her and the family at large. A child should be allowed to express his or her feelings freely, listen to and give views to situations.

Security rights include all the necessary measures that ensure a child's life is not endangered. Involving children in rivals and wars is violating their right to security.

All stakeholders, parents, teachers, children officers and the government should ensure that children and their rights are protected.

Leopard who was called Chui and Hare who was called Sungura were good friends. When Leopard was invited by his in-laws, he took Hare as his companion. Leopard was greedy and did not want to share whatever was served with anyone, therefore made a plan.

Each of the two friends carried a bag with their personal things on their shoulders: a large one for leopard and a smaller one for Hare. Leopard began to show his true colours before they reached to his in-laws. He took a straw which he used when taking porridge and hid it in a bush. He claimed that it would be bad manners for them to appear too eager to drink their porridge. To leopard, hiding the straw was a mark of politeness. He insisted that when they were served with beer or welcoming porridge, Hare would return to where Leopard had hidden the straw and take it back to Leopard's in-laws place.

At last they arrived and were welcomed with a lot of joy by Leopard's in-laws. When a pot of porridge was produced, leopard turned to Hare, "you remember what I told you," he whispered. Hare continued to stare at the pot until Leopard stamped his foot.

Hare got up and went back to where Leopard had hidden the straw. As soon as Hare left, leopard took the pot of porridge and began to drink from it without waiting for the straw. He drank and drank until his stomach was full. When there was no porridge left in the pot, he handed it back to his hosts. "Thank you very much," he said. "That was very nice porridge I dare say, the best I have ever tasted." His in-laws were happy to hear him say that.

When Hare got back with the straw, Leopard turned to him and said, "sorry, you took so long, my friend. The porridge had to be drunk before it went bad. You should have hurried back as I told you."
